How she CALE BY HER NAME.

Any one who ky lws the neighborhood of London knows the London clay. The hedges are heaped, up of London clay, the ditches are duffer in it, the fichis that are plowed turn thup thick and lough and ill favored, the loues walls are built of it, burned into pale bricks, the roofs are thed with is, the very swalows nests under the every are molded out of it, walk along the reads, and your boots are clogged with it. walk as gingerly as nests under the e-wasts and , your boots are clogged with i. Walk as gingerly as you will, you are harpattered with it. Wittin 20 or 30 piles of London occurs a tract of flat cla-land, of fields of cablages and beans and corn, surrounced by stunted thorn fightes, with here and there a brick and tile yard, some worked, others deserted; it e old brick fields converted into ragged sloppy depressions, into which is cast all the retuse from the neighborhood. Thire stand pools of stagnant water, fringed with coarse grass, and the bask is sparsely producing doo, daisies, and yillow tapsies.

The road here if ms straight as though made by the old Formans, or as a French road engineered in der the first Napileon. Beside this road, as a gate, opening into a waste piece of ground slightly raised above the surrounding surface, and on this patch of wests land stands a windmill.

of a golden yellow. The cottage had a lift of garden round it, surrounded by a ditch fringed with willows. The garden formed an oblong patch, apparently taken out from a field. This was, however, not the case. The garden and house of the miller were older by at least a hundred years than the field, which had been inclosed within the memory of man from what had been common. Long before the oldest man could remember, or before the oldest man could tell of having heard by older men before him, there had been a windmill on Ring moor, and the miller's cottage had stood where it stands still. Ring moor was moor no more—1; was all inclosed, and enlitvated, and drained.

In the cottage loe Western lived with his inother. His father was dead. He had fallen one day, when drunk from the steps that led up into the mill, and had broken, as folk said, every bone in his body. This was an exaggeration. He had broken two or three, but one was enough to settle him—his skull, which struck a stone.

When old Miller Western died Joe was 19 years old. Weighty responsibilities rested on him. He had his mother to maintain, his own future to determ ne. He was advised by all his father's friends to throw up the mill, as beyond the business powers of a beardless boy. How could a lad without a hair on his chim—with only down on his upper lip—conduct a mill? Joe was a salent follow, very self contained and reserved. He listened to advice, and did not combat the reasoning of his advisors. What could he say? Nothing but time could grow the necessary hair on his face which would capacitate him, in public estimation, for carrying on the mill. He had broad shoulders; he put them under the burden without a word, and pursued his own course. He look and he knew its ins and outs thormes, and he knew its ins and outs thormes.

Half a mile off, ries the wall of a park. That wall marks the limit of London clay and the beginning of gravel marks, where beans end and trees commence, where the plow causes to run its flurrow, and the cow and the spen and even the deer run instead.

In the mill worked Joe Western, considered a surly, because a silent, man, but certainly ungental and unsociable—a good deal of London clay in his composition apparently. Word, and places without a beard on his chin; but partly from indolence and dislike of change, and partly because there was no other mill near, the old customers did not fulfill their-threat of leaving, and Joe Western soon acquired fresh customers—he gave good measure. His hand did not go lito the bag too often, or had no; so big a grasp us that of his father. Moreover, he did not mix inferior grain with the good sent him.

Mrs. Western was a quiet old woman, with a great love for her sor, not; unmixed with fear. Eyen she shought it was strange, unnatural for one of Joe's age to be so tacturn, so fesolved, so unsociable.

She shook her head and sighed to her friends, "Joe is a good lad, good as gold, without vice of any sort in him. He'll never marry, that's certain, and a pity it is. Ho would nowhere flud a young woman serious enough to suit him. They're all giddy pates howedays, thinking of nothing but dress, putting all their wages on their backs.

"Ant would never do for Joe, he is all for sarving. They like chattering; he hardly ever talks. They are all for nuching and singing and dancing. I never hear him shout or laugh, he schree smiles, but goes for quietly at his work like a machine. If I were not I is mother I should find that there with him, and don't know what I should do without the pigs and the poultry. Did you ever before see any one who never 'alked except he'd got something to say' My Joe don't, and that would not penient a young woman."

cept he'd got something to say' My Joe don't, and that would not pentent a young woman."

One day when a fresh northwest breeze was blowing, and the white clouds were flying over the sky, the mill wings were whirling with great vigor, and the wind rushed off them in spouts of cold air.

Happening to go the mill door, Joe was surprised and startled to see a little figure of a girl turn out of the road, and come over the short grass toward the mill, with the eyes raised to the sails. The child came on unconscious of finger, unaware of the danger of approaching and coming within the sweep of those mighty revolving wings.

Joe called to warn the child off; but she either did not hear, or disregarded the monitior. Then, with a frown and an exclamation of impatience, Joe, randown the steps, strode over, the turf, caught the child by the arm, and roughly swing it asice.

"I want a fly," she 'said; "I am going up on one of those great wings. Step them for me to climb on to one."

It was now Joe's place to stand and stare. The child's bright eyes were full of eagerness, the checks were fushed, and her hair, almost white in the sun, blow about her head in the wind like cotton grass.

'Yes, but again up: I should go."

It was not possible to convince the child. Joe could not leave the mill longer, the bell was tangling to tell that the hopper was empty. He dare not let her remain where she was lest she should step where the revolving wings might atrike her, and one touch of those mighty rushing arms would beat the little, bounding, happy, eager life out of her.

He had in his pocket a piece of stout twins. Without another word he drew ber to the steps, bound her hands together at the wrists, and fastened her firmly to the rail. Then without speaking, but with a grim look out of his gray eyes, and a frown and a sbake of the head, he wort in the stairs.

After a while, he returned. He liad dome what was necessary for a while, gid resolved to release the girl. He had given her a lesson, and he hoped she would profit by it, and never again come near the mill.

Bhe was not crying. She was sitting on the step with her hands over her head, fast to the rail, and her face peering between her arms it the revolving sails. "Now, then," said Joe Western, "do you see! It is foolery. If you held to the har of a sail as it went up, you'd be flump head over heels coming down, let go, and be dashed to riccos. Is that sense?"

"Yes the first how the satisfied! Go."

"How so?" specingly.
"I don't know. I must think."

Transplanting an Eye.

MR. WILLIAMS' OPTIC REMOVED AND THAT OF A RABERT SUBSTITUTED.

Among the feats illustrating the worderful progress of modern surgery, is the transplantation of eyes. Upon rubbigs, transplantation has proven eminently successful, but upon man it has never been given a fair trial until the beginning of this menth. The experiment was then tried in New York, and, so far as transplantation is concerned, was a perfect success. The eye of a live rabbit was placed in the empty conjunctival sac of man, the muscles, pervess and tissues united, and the eye actually became a purt of the human organism. However, as a whole, the experiment was a failure, arising from the experiment was a failure. muscles, nerves and tissues united, and the eye actually became a pirt of the human organism. However, as a whole, the experiment was a failure, arising from the difficulty encountered during the healing period. This difficulty is attributed to the insufficient vitality of the rabbit's eye. As the muscular power of man is greater than that of the rubbit, so the muscular action of the eye is greater, and this action the transplanted eye was unable to with

One naturally inquires why the rabbit's eye, was used. Because the rabbit's eye, although somewhat smaller, comes nearer in resemblance to the human eye than that of any other animal. The arrangement of muscles and blood-vessels in the rabbit is identical with that of the human eye. This is the first time the experiment was ever tried under favorable conditions, and the fact that it will probably never be attempted again, mukes the case a remarkable one. Of course, if the eyes of macrould be transplanted, it would be within bounds to anticipate successfu, results, but as there might be objections to this, the feasibility of transplantation in man may be regarded as practically and finally settled. One naturally inquires why the rabbit's The experimental operation was per

The experimental operation was performed upon Mr. Charles Alfred Milliams, City Ecitor of the Mineapolis Tribuse, by Dr. Charles H. May, instructor in ophthaim ogy at the New York Folyclinic, and clynical assistant in the same department at the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons. He was as slated by Dr. E. Gruening, also a prominent occupiet, and Dr. Wilmer, of Mt. Sinai Hospital, in the presence of a half-dyzen students of the institutions named.

Two weeks prior to the arrival of the patient had been occupied in attempting to secure a rabbit with hazel eyes and of the largest size. A flue specimen of the variety known as the Belgian hare was finally selected. The eyes were just a shade darker and only two-twenty-fifths of an inch smaller than the uninjured one of Every precaution had been taken to insure success if it were possible. The physicians had even tested, their knowledge and still upon us many fresh eadavers as could be procured at the college dissecting room. The operation was performed without a slip, with the result already made known.

The rabbit was placed upon a small table and the patient upon a lounge a few feel distant. The former wisthen subjected to the influence of ether, five ounces of the drug and ten minutes' time being required to effect the result. The ether was then administered to Mr. Williams. The globe of the eye was rapidly and carefully separated from the conjunctiva, or see holding it, the nuscles severed and the eye left the the conjunctival sac only attached to the optic nerve. This was done to keep the eye alive until the instant of transplantation. The surgeons next turned their attention to the patient. Aspring speculium was introduced under the lids of the righeye to give perfect freedom for the opera-

The operation occupied one hour and a quarter On the second day the cornea or surface of the transplanted eye showed a slight laziness, much less than had been anticipated; and this continued throughout the experiment. On the fourth day, on the removal of the bandages—which, by the way, were changed three times a day—it was discovered, by moving the uniquired eye, that the severed parts had grown together, and that the rabbit's eye was actually a fart of the human being. The slid satures were thereupon removed. The union was complete, the transplantation an accomplished fact.
